INTRODUCTION Shale is the predominant sedimentary rock in the crust of the earth. Knowledge of the expectable chemical composition of shale and its variations is an important part of the data needed to interpret the chemical and physical processes involved in the erosion of source rocks, the mode of transportation of the resulting detritus to depositional sites, and the subsequent modifications of the material during diagenesis and lithification. Kind of source rock and its degree and type of weathering, mode and distance of transportation, and environments of deposition and diagenesis all influence the composition of shale; and characteristics and interactions of these factors must be deduced in large part from the composition of their products. Better understanding of these fundamental earth processes as they affect shale ultimately may lead to better consideration of such different problems as the possibility of ore deposits being formed by segregation of ore elements during metamorphism of shale, and the genesis and migration of petroleum and gas. In addition, data on the composition of shale aid in evaluation of the economic potential of the shale itself and, when related to the physical properties of the shale, in the planning and construction of engineering works located on shale terranes. The Pierre shale and its equivalent stratigraphic units of Late Cretaceous age seem to offer excellent opportunities for obtaining data that would apply to such questions. The...
