In five years they surveyed and delineated no less than 30,000 miles of coast. There is no branch of his Majesty s service more arduous in its nature or more important in its consequences than nautical surveying. As it requires abilities above the common, and is directly conducive to the safety of navigation, and consequent activity of commerce, so it is on both accounts peculiarly entitled to public encouragement. England, glorying in the victories of her navy, may also justly boast that in this department, --in the work of peace, --it is also pre-eminent. Other nations may maintain hydrographieal establishments on a more liberal or splendid scale, and give to the claims of science a little of that consideration which British Parliaments bestow solely on pecuniary interests. But the enlightened liberality of a government cannot in such a case supply the place of practised seamanship in its officers, or of the united skill and courage required in one whose duty it is to explore hidden dangers, and to seek the shoals in order that he may teach others how to avoid them. Future generations will ever regard with gratitude and admiration the labours of such men as Vancouver, King, and Owen. But the same officer who surveyed in five years 30,000 miles of coast, was unable to find his way through his own manuscripts in double that period. Impatient of sedentary labour, Captain Owen at last gave the raw materials of his narrative to his...
