Excerpt: . . . 11 analysis - often based on misconceptions of the approach undertaken in review. We are publishing a detailed paper responding to the critiques this week. In summary, the economic analysis in the Review remains robust. The costs of inaction on climate change are much greater than the likely costs of early action to reduce the risks. THE ANALYSIS IS BUILT ON THE EXISTING LITERATURE BUT THE ESTIMATES OF THE, COST OF DAMAGES WERE HIGHER FOR THREE REASONS First, crucial advances of the science in the past few years have allowed estimates to be made of the probabilities of temperature rises associated with increases in the quantity of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. These estimates point to significant risks of temperature increases above 5 degrees C under a business-as-usual scenario by the early part of the next century. Previous studies have mainly focused on 2-3 degrees C temperature rises and our results for these temperatures are consistent with existing studies. Second, we have taken account of the impact on wellbeing across the full range of possible outcomes, including worst-and best-case scenarios, and have explicitly built in aversion to risk. Risks and uncertainties are the heart climate change mod-elling, and risk aversion entails giving more weight to the worse outcomes, as people routinely do in their daily lives, for example, in buying insurance. That, together with the risks of higher temperatures, and an ethically supportable approach to val-uing future lives, is what drives our...
